

The out of work population is not a monolithic group of people

Their demographic makeup is varied as are the barriers they must overcome to find work.

Also, the out of work population varies by place [link to jurisdiction data below]. Lorem ipsum dolor sit amet, consectetur adipiscing elit. Suspendisse porta purus rutrum tortor gravida, interdum scelerisque enim accumsan. Duis velit lectus, rutrum sed leo id, ultrices tincidunt nunc.

We looked at the characteristics of the out of work population from many angles [all the dimensions of the cluster analysis]. We used these data to identify discrete groupings of people within each jurisdiction and then to categorize each grouping into broad groups. These groups provide a meaningful entry point to the discussion of workforce challenges and priorities for each jurisdiction in the dataset.

We identified seven categories of the out of work population. Then, using data on the educational attainment, work history, age, english proficiency, disability status, and family structure, we are able to provide guidance on the likely programs to benefit each group. These types of programs include:
